When you think of animatronics at a theme park attraction, you're probably thinking of the old-fashioned little dolls that bob their heads up and down on This Little World. But it's 2017, and theme parks have seriously stepped up their game. Disney World's Animal Kingdom theme park is about to open a section dedicated to the movie Avatar, and it has an animatronic character that is so realistic you'll have to constantly remind yourself that it's a robot. Inside The Magic posted a video from inside one of the rides, Na'vi River Journey, and animatronics are so realistic that it's creepy. The clip shows an animatronic shaman songs figure singing a song and making crazy intense eye contact with riders on boats. The way she moves is elegant, artistic and terribly realistic, but she's definitely a robot, not a man in blue makeup. I promise. And this seems to have an even greater impact on the person. Her fluid movement is so realistic that it's actually scary on some level, writer JeniLynn Knopp notes, inside the magic. You feel a bit as if this piece of Imagineering is seen in your soul. The rest of the ride has even more super-life scenes like Na'vi and The Animals on Pandora. There are also many neon plants and flowers, and really peaceful music to set the mood.
